No Minnesota District Has Enough Affordable Housing to Meet Renters' Needs

Housing is considered affordable when households spend no more than 30% of their monthly gross income on housing, according to the Census Bureau.

When families pay more than 30% of their income on rent and utilities, they grow more likely to cut corners on necessities, like food or health care, or they become more likely to go into debt.

Proportion of Renter Households Paying at Least 30% of Their Income for Housing